

Bourdieu the Eel

My philosopher friends
Georges Jeanres

Bourdieu the Eel
does not lack zeal.

He feels that the
eels' little town
is too boring.
What a yawn!

He wants to live in Fish City
where the homes are big and pretty.

He works very hard
every day
and earns lots of money that way.

After he's saved up
enough pay
it's time for him to move away.

He really loves
his new mansion,
he fills it with
decoration.

But his neighbors all
sneer and frown,
it's not the fashion of the town!

He tries to make
new friends,
but they mock how he feels.

His taste and opinions are still those of an eel.

Bourdieu cries,
hurt by this turn.
He has so much more
left to learn.

He thought his efforts
had earned his wish,
but the work is
never-ending
for an eel
to become a fish.

FOR GROWN UPS:

PIERRE BOURDIEU is a French sociologist known for the idea of CULTURAL CAPITAL.

He shows that it's not only money that separates rich and poor people.

These inequalities are made stronger by many hidden things: your tastes, your manners, the way you speak, the books you've read, or even the people you know...

They form an invisible "capital" that causes many kinds of DISCRIMINATION.
